Welcome to the joint meeting of the Society of Southwest Archivists (SSA) and the Southern Archivists Conference (SAC). Indeed, we have cast a wide net, bringing together archivists from Arizona to Georgia to learn and network with each other as well as enjoy New Orleans!

As president of the SSA, I look forward to meeting many of you and attending the sessions and repository tours that our Program Committee and Local Arrangement Committee have prepared. The Annual Meeting is the highlight of SSA’s year, so enjoy learning from your colleagues, meeting new people, and providing input on how we as archivists can promote diversity in our organization, our profession, and our collections.

Sincerely,
Susan Novick, CA

Planning Fundable Grant Projects
D. H. Holmes B, 8:30 - 11:30 am.

Instructors: Danielle Plumer and Ann Hodges

This three-hour in person workshop, covering grant planning and basic application information, is intended for all audiences but especially people fairly new to grant writing.

Project Management for Archivists
D. H. Holmes B. 1:00 - 5:00 pm.

Instructors: Stephanie Bayless and Brian Robertson

Whether you are processing a collection, implementing a new digital system, moving to a new facility, setting up a public program, or creating an award-winning exhibit, you are serving as a de facto project manager. Archivists spend a large amount of our time working with these types of assignments with little to no project management training in our repertoire. In this workshop, participants will learn practical project management skills and tips with real-world application possibilities. We will discuss the ins-and-outs of project planning, scheduling, communication, and system utilization. Participants will be invited to share their successes and challenges, as well as present current projects for group discussion and assistance.

Grant Writing Clinic
D. H. Holmes C, 1:30 - 5:00 pm.

Instructors: Danielle Plumer and Ann Hodges

This three-hour, in person grant writing clinic is intended for experienced grant writers. Attendees will be asked to submit an application.

Gwen Thompkins, is the former East Africa bureau chief for National Public Radio, based in Nairobi, Kenya. She was also the longtime editor of NPR’s Weekend Edition Saturday, with Scott Simon. In 2011, after a Nieman Foundation for Journalism fellowship at Harvard University, Thompkins returned home to New Orleans. She’s currently the host and executive producer of the public radio program Music Inside Out, with Gwen Thompkins, which features Louisiana artists whose music resonates around the world. Thompkins will talk about the role that music plays in the reporting of news stories and in the collective memory of societies grappling with their own historic narratives.

The Road Less Taken: New means and paths towards the archival profession

As the face of the archives has changed over the years, interdisciplinary and cross-disciplinary jobs provide the opportunity for archival work outside of traditional archivist positions. Once the arena of historians and PhDs, today more archivists come from fields ranging from the humanities to computer science, either settling in or passing through on the way to other responsibilities. In a difficult economic climate, discussing professionalism in archives benefits students and new archivists, as well as managers. Attendees will hear about a variety of career paths and participate in discussions about the changing identity of archivists. Drawing upon the varied and unique experiences of the panelists, this session will discuss how and why people choose the archival profession, the paths they have taken, and how we as archivists can use this diversity to continue to reshape and improve the profession as a whole.

New Mexico Historical Records Advisory Board Grant Program: Stellar Projects and Strategies for Improving Participation From Underserved and Tribal Communities

This session highlights successful projects funded by the New Mexico Historical Records Advisory Board (NMHRAB) grant program (designed to strengthen and support records programs in New Mexico and so preserve the state’s rich cultural heritage) by showcasing two organizations’ stellar projects in preserving valuable historic New Mexico records. The session will also highlight the NMHRAB’s efforts to broaden the pool of grant applicants, in particular NMHRAB’s partnership with the Northern Rio Grande National Heritage Area and the collaboration to preserve historic records as part of the cultural landscape of New Mexico. With a particular emphasis on working with the Eight Northern Pueblos of New Mexico, this outreach program provides information about NMHRAB’s programs, helps to assess needs and provides contacts for assistance in both work to be done and grant writing.

What's Cooking in the Archives? Broadening Archival Outreach through Cuisine and Culture

Food is an important aspect of culture. The production, consumption, and documentation of different types of cuisines are means through which people can share their traditions and create a fusion of those traditions into something new. Presenters of this session will discuss their archive’s efforts to acquire, interconnect, publish, and increase awareness of their collections concerning local and ethnic cuisines. Topics to be covered include: how the collections were formed; the methods through which they were highlighted to increase awareness and access; and how the archives reinterpreted the materials through the use of social, digital, and print media.

Boot Camp: Fishing for Minnows: Reeling Volunteers into the Archives

Increasingly, volunteers are an important source of labor in archives, providing valuable assistance in a time of reduced budgets and limited staff. Yet the use of unpaid labor in archives is controversial, as recent discussions on the Archives & Archivists Listserv make clear. Drawing on more than 40,000 hours of combined experience working with volunteers in archives and museums, the speakers will address the benefits and the challenges of unpaid labor in the archives. This session will discuss the fundamentals of good volunteer management including recruitment, training, and retention. The speakers will also discuss the changing character of the volunteer workforce, emphasizing both the needs of college students, who take on unpaid internships in archives, and the expectations of Baby Boomer volunteers, who have a different view of volunteering than previous generations.

Lights, Camera, Archives! Making archival documentaries

Archives have always been a tremendous source of material for documentary filmmakers, and most archivists, at some point in their careers have interacted with filmmakers on their projects. But, have you ever wanted to make your own? Archivists as storytellers and filmmakers can be a great way to get your story out to your audience and to leverage your unique collections and present them in new and dynamic ways. This session will include the different experiences of three archives with creating their own movies, from a $0 budget documentary short to a full length professionally produced film, and others in between. The session will also address some of the technical issues you would need to address if you wanted to start a project, such as prepping your materials for filming, writing a script, and editing.

Digging Deep: Exposing the Historical value of Government Records

Three municipal archivists discuss the historical significance of government records. Specifically the City of San Antonio, the City of Oklahoma City, and the City of New Orleans. The purpose of the session is to reveal the historical value of government records to the archival community by sharing examples of how municipal records can be used as evidence for cultural, historical, and family history study. Each of the municipalities represented in this session maintain their archives in a unique way, broadening the conversation to include access and preservation issues.

Commemorating the Battle of New Orleans... Again: “We Fired Once More...”

The panel will feature three experts on the Battle of New Orleans who are intimately involved with preparations for its bi-centennial celebration; numerous exhibits and events will take place in the city and state throughout 2014, building up to the anniversary on January 8, 2015. While the panel’s main focus will be on the relevant archival holdings of local institutions, the talks will also illustrate the fact that archives and manuscripts do not exist in a vacuum, and often serve historians and the general public best when studied alongside contextualizing artifacts, illustrations, and trends in popular culture – both the organically and the institutionally transmitted sort. When all these resources are brought to bear, they can become a tremendous tool for researchers - and for tourism marketing boards.

Changing Directions: Fresh Perspectives on Prioritizing and Processing Collections

In June of 2011, The Texas Collection purchased an integrated archival management system to improve access to collections, produce finding aids, MARC records, and EAD files, and to track the progress of processing collections. After implementing this system, The Texas Collection changed the way collections were processed and priorities established. This session will investigate reasons for processing collections, such as improving donor relations, aligning with a collections development policy, and recognizing the historical value of a collection. Case studies of recently processed African American collections and a records group from a Southern Baptist maverick will illustrate these points.

Marketing Finding Aids: What Worked and What Didn’t Work

Librarians at Sam Houston State University asked themselves how effective social media sites (Facebook, Twitter, Tumblr, etc.) were at promoting and increasing awareness of finding aids located on the institution’s Archon website. By selecting ten social media sites, promoting one finding aid per week for twelve weeks and then measuring the impact of the finding aids in the social media environment our team has compared the marketing reach of social media platforms for Archon finding aids. The panelists will discuss their experience with promoting archival collections and finding aids on social media, the results of the study and potential applications and outcomes of our findings.

Boot Camp: Records Management for Archivists: Embracing the Dark Side

Whether you work with records managers but don’t understand them, need a records manager but don’t have one, suddenly find yourself being the records manager, or are just “records management curious,” this bootcamp session can help you combine the best parts of the archives and records management professions into one unstoppable toolkit. Topics covered will include a translation guide for the basic vocabulary of records management; a detailed look at retention schedules and why archivists should know about them; and an open exploration of what records managers can teach archivists, and what archivists can teach records managers. We will follow all this up with lots of time for questions and a heaping serving of additional resources that will help session participants find the answers they need when they are back at their home institutions.

Hidden Learning: The Student Experience in Special Collections

The University of Arkansas Special Collections provides a rich learning environment for students. While the University of Arkansas does not offer formal courses in archival studies, students across the University learn from work and practical experience through the Special Collections’ close collaboration between emerging professionals and archivists. This panel will address ways these collaborations manifest in every aspect of the department’s activities, from a formal program with the University’s Honor College to student workers and volunteers working within its Research Services and the Architectural Archives. The panel will discuss the educational impact on both the students and the archivists. Newly acquired skills and knowledge of archival principles, practices, and institutions allow interns additionally to gain Archival Intelligence (AI) while allowing Special Collections to fulfill its mission and participate in the campus’s community of learning.

Archival Adaptation: Responsive Approaches to Standards-Based Processing

We all know that processing collections is at the core of what we do, and that how we do it has significant impacts on the way that the historical record is preserved, discovered, and perceived. We also generally have a very good idea of how to approach processing thanks to the available standards. But what happens when you decide to implement MPLP at your institution? Or when you're faced with the task of processing records from one of the most gruesome prison riots in U.S. history, bringing to the forefront issues of privacy, ethics, and social justice? What about the day that someone decides to donate a collection of 500 boxes and in the midst of processing, you have a complete employee turnover? This session will explore the necessity of archival adaptation and the benefits of being able and willing to change, learn, and grow as archivists.

Storming the Archives: Undergraduates and Oral Histories

In casting a wider net, many archives attempt to broaden the archival experiences of their student population, particularly undergraduates. At Texas A&M University-Commerce, what began as an effort to promote undergraduate scholarship in the archives via oral histories, led to a student-driven veteran’s oral history project, the success of which has astounded everyone involved. The East Texas War & Memory Project (ETWMP) differs from other veterans’ oral history projects in that it was spearheaded and is currently led by undergraduates. This presentation will cover the evolution of this project from its inception by a group of eager undergraduates to its current status from the perspectives of the archivist, students, and other faculty members involved. Ideas will be shared for how a project such as this could be implemented at other institutions.

Boot Camp: Driven by Disaster: How Unexpected Events Challenge Collection Activities in the Digital Age

Natural disasters have a profound effect on individuals and communities. Archives play an important role in preserving the primary source records of these calamitous events for future study. This boot camp session will address the activities of archives and special collections in collecting, preserving and making accessible the documentation of natural disasters. The Pikes Peak Library District Special Collections was challenged by the destructive 2012 Waldo Canyon Fire to address the acquisition, preservation and accessibility of born-digital archival resources (records/reports, press releases, photographs, video recordings, maps and websites). Presenters will address coming to terms with the reality of digital preservation, implementing 21st century collection development practices, and preserving and providing access to born digital materials, all within the context of responding to a natural disaster, when there is little time to prepare.

The archives is the keeper of stories, which we use to showcase our organization's identity, discover the personality of the records creator, or evoke a sense of another era or place. However, other stories in the archives sometimes pose a challenge, and there are times we might choose to gloss over certain topics for reasons ranging from offending donors or administration to privacy issues to concerns over obtaining tenure. Clark explores decision making with regard to providing online access to sensitive content including sexuality, graphic wartime images, and racial slurs. Ellis discusses the acquisition of the papers of Selma, Alabama, Sheriff Jim Clark of "Bloody Sunday" fame, which initially made university administrators leery but has turned out to be one of their most accessed collections. Gottwald looks at the need to balance the access needs of researchers against the sensitivities of survivors when dealing with records relating to aircraft accidents.
